

Louis Alexander

4th Grade

The changes cats and dogs would have to make to survive as a homeless pet is they would have to find food on their own. Nobody would be able to bring them food. They would have to know how to defend themselves if they were homeless.

They would also have to find a place to sleep. They would not have a nice bed or something to sleep on. They would have to learn their way in and out the neighborhood to know where to go and where not to go. Cats and dogs would have to find fresh water to drink.

Dogs would have to learn not to chase cars, because if they run in the street they might get ran over. Sometimes cats and dogs will have to get along. If they were homeless they would have to run and hide from animal control.

Cats would have to sleep in trees. Dogs might have to sneak into people's backyard to sleep. Cats and dogs would have to eat out of dumpsters in the back of food places. They would have to steal food from other animals and might get in fights with other dogs and cats. That is why they would need to learn how to defend themselves.

Cats would have to overcome their fear of water. So if they are being chased by something they can jump in the water and swim away. Those are the changes cats and dogs would have to make if they were homeless.